Jul 2013

I told you folks I've been sick! I think after all the recovery is over I will be feeling much stronger and better than before the surgery. People ask me if I was scared going into surgery. I can honestly say that I had no fear and had a peace that passes understanding. I learned long ago that there is no need to worry about things over which I have no control or choice. I had the choice to say yes or no to the surgery, but once I said yes then it was totally out of my hands and I let it all go.

I have been teased about getting a calf valve replacement, and some asked if I had been having any strange feelings or emotions now that I am part animal and my blood flows through a calf valve. There are a few things I have noticed. I am sure I got a male (bull) valve because I still have an attraction to females. If I was looking differently at males, then I would be concerned. I also have a desire for more roughage in my food, so I am eating more greens. When I see something red, I sort of want to run after it and try to butt it with my head. Otherwise, things seem about the same. Oh yes, I do get kind of emotional and weepy when I go by a steak house. I guess I will still eat some steak from some grown older cows, but veal that comes from calves is now off my menu. I have already donated my organs when I die if I have anything worth using. I am not going to allow a calf to one up me and neither should you. Moo-o-o!
